Chapter 1 by Cameryn

Sometimes, I wonder whether you care. Sometimes I wonder whether I care. Sometimes, I think about every infinity out there and wonder about what could be better than the life I have here...

Chapter 2 by Feodor

...but then the sun shines in my face. The very same sun that shines in your face, in his face. The sun that shines in the face of all beings who choose to turn their heads to it. The sun who shines on the feet of those who choose not to look.

I chose to look away for four years. Four years too long if you ask me.

But that is okay, because now I have today, and tomorrow, and the rest of my life, which with any luck will be long and beautiful with my new friend The Sun.

But...

Chapter 3 by Gabe

...the sun sets, as all things do. It's one of the crueler curses of sentience that the joy of now be corrupted with the knowledge that it will end, and that you must experience that too. Your deepest love will die in one way or another, and all that is exciting may become dull.

So what is one to do about it? Does one withdraw from it all and seek an existence of pure neutrality? Or perhaps you can decide to see a beauty to the tumult of the human experience.

Perhaps for all the ups and downs one may go through, the ups really are just worth it. There may be an end to every happiness, but there is also an end to every sadness as well, and it can be quite the journey between them. One worth making, I think.
